HITACHI Finger Vein detection

Secure As finger vein patterns are found internally within the body, forgery is extremely difficult. Dryness or roughness on the surface of the skin also has no effect on the accuracy of vein pattern authentication.

Based on the patterns of veins in one's finger or hand, vascular pattern recognition VPR) provides the ease of use of hand geometry with much improved accuracy, smaller readers and contact less use. Hitachi's finger vein system scans the veins one's fingers and then match the vein patterns of their respective preestablished templates.

As near infrared light generated by Bank of LEDs (light emitting diodes) penetrates the body tissue, it is reflected in the hemoglobin in the blood. A CCD (charge coupled evice) camera (which uses a small, rectangular piece of silicon to receive incoming light) captures the image of the vein pattern through this reflected light. Image processing constructs a finger vein pattern from the camera image. This pattern is compressed and digitized so that it can be registered as a template or digitized image that it compares to the stored template of the user, and determines whether there is a match, using patter-matching techniques.

The actual algorithms used in the process differ from vendor to vendor.
